What is a native plant and why should I use them?

Native plants have evolved in Missouri since the last ice age, some 10,000 years ago and covered the Missouri landscape when Lewis and Clark explored here in the early 1800s. As European settlers moved into the area, they began changing the landscape in ways that has led to the loss of much of Missouri's native habitat. Using native plants in planned landscapes helps increase the biodiversity that supports a rich web of wildlife that includes birds, butterflies and beneficial insects. In addition, because native plants are adapted to Missouri soils and climate, they seldom need fertilizer, pesticides or irrigation. They can survive extreme heat and cold, as well as drought and flood and are an excellent choice for farm conservation projects, eliminating mowing on small acreages and bringing beauty to small lots in cities and suburbs.
